The past decade was often marked by cases of law-enforcement misconduct; some were extreme, involving life-and-death situations that resulted from decisions made under the stresses of time and critical incidents. These incidents highlighted the need to continuously train and educate law-enforcement officers in the fundamentals of ethical decision making.

This is a highly interactive and student-centered course focusing on the fundamentals of ethics related to our culture and a democratic society.

From past eras of policing up to present day, law-enforcement officers are called upon often to make difficult decisions alone, without supervision or advice and in extreme circumstances. Preparation through training and education is the key to enabling those officers to survive morally as well as physically.
